- Who: Junior who recently met acquaintances through a club and a study group
- Problem confirmed? Yes, mildly. Described before the concept: last week she opened a DM to a study-group acquaintance after seeing a concert post, typed a message, deleted it, and never sent it. Roughly a couple of times a month; consequence is losing touch with someone she nearly considered a friend.
- Key quote: "I don't have a reason to message."
- Emotional intensity (1–10): 4. She went quiet on the unsent DM but said "nothing bad happens."
- Current solution: Instagram follows, likes, and story reactions. Keeps her visible but doesn't lead to conversation.
- Money spent?: None on reconnecting. (She pays for iCloud storage, which does not count.)
- Solution reaction: "Oh, that's kind of nice actually." She pictured sending a club retreat photo to someone who was there.
- Biggest concern: "It looking at my whole camera roll."
- Referral?: Offered to ask Jordan, a new club member.
- Follow-up?: Agreed.
- Surprise: She already resurfaces photos through Snapchat Memories but sends them only to close friends, never acquaintances, which shows photo nostalgia and reconnection are separate behaviors here.
- Signal (green/yellow/red): Yellow. Unprompted, recent incident that matches the idea, plus a positive first reaction, a concrete use case, a referral, and a follow-up. Held back by low intensity, no spend, and a camera-roll access concern. Her reaction may reflect enjoying photos more than needing help reconnecting.
